IMAGINARY CONVERSATION. [From Punch.] QUEEN VICTORA -- EMPEROR NAPOLEON-THE

PRINCE CONSORT. The Emperor -- I venture to hope that your Majesty is pleased with my little improvement in Cherbourg? The Queen-Wonders, I assure your Majesty-marvels, to use your uncle's word on that pedestal. I see a greater wonder, however, than any you have pointed out. The Emperor-And that is-

The Queen (smiling)-That you are the showman.

The Emperor (smiling)-It is so. Am I too egotistic in adding-long may that cause of wonder exist? The Queen-On the contrary, I beartily echo the wish, espescially when I see your Majesty surrounded with temptations to place that marvel among the things of the past. The Emperor-May I ask how?

The Queen-By bringing any of these improvements into actual use. Ot course you will not be angry with me? The Emperor-Were it possible for me as a man, the family of kings knows no such wicked and plebeian passion as anger. The Prince (aside, with a shrug) -- He of the lamily. Mein Gott! The Queen-Did you speak, Albert? The Prince-I was thinking-I should rather say I was trying to recollect who that cape yonder is called on the east of the

The Emperor-It bears the name of Lev The Prince-Of course, so it is. I forgo The Emperor (laughs) -- Not an easy nam for some f. lks to forget, I can tell you, Prince And your majesty has deigned to notice or bumble breakwater there?

The Queer.-A noble work. We have nothing like it; I mean in point of size. Our Plymouth one is only 1,800 metres longthat must be twice the length.

The Prince-So it ought to be. You have been at it since 1783; our first stone was dropped into the sea in 1812. The Emperor (sside with a shrug)-He talk of our first stone! Mon Dieu!

The Queen-I repeat, that it is a noble work, and a fleet chased by an enemy could certainly get behind it, and save itself, unless the enemy sailed very well, as Captain Preedy did in the Agamemoon for instance The Emperor-I trust that is not the us to which a French fleet will put the bay in my time. The Queen-I sincerely trust not. It neur ly broke Lord Nelson's heart to be kep watching the fleet in Toulon for two years and then Admiral Villeneave slipped out and ran away to the West Indies after all.

The Emperor-How good your Majesty's memory is. The Queen-A king owes it to his good subjects to have a good memory. The Emperor-True, madam, and to make his bad ones have a good memory about him. The Queen (laughing) -- Perhaps, but I have no bad subjects in my den of assassins

The Emperor-Ah! pardon a rude soldier's zeal. It was but a complaint from the Hospital of Invalids.

Shall I behead the editor of Charivari, and give you his place?

The Prince-Many thanks, but I should never be able to correct my proof-sheets by SUPER PHOSPHATE OF LIME, done so, I believe in your time, and toerefore thicks little of the bardship.

The Emperor (gravely) - The press is an institution which I have not yet put "on its Farming community. The Queen (laughing) - One for a Trinity Brother. The Emperor-This is fine gan, your Maj esty, very powerfully and capitally cast, The Queen (examines it)-O yes. Beauti ful! I know it must be a good one, for it is exactly like a number we were looking over at Woolwich the other day. Don't you remember. Albert?

The Prince-Perfectly, and they were making some more from the same pattern .-But I am a lover of economy, and I wish we did not go to the expense of casting guns, but imitated our dramatic authors.

The Queen-What do you mean, dear? The Prince-Took all our pieces from the French. The Emperor-Ha! ha! You, must, positively, edit the Charivari for me, Prince.

The Queen- He is very rude, your Majesty. I suppose the voyage has disagreed with him and made him cross, else he would have complimented you upon these fortifications, which are certainly magnificent and worthy of France and her Emperor.

The Emperor-Perhaps, Madam, the same celestial atmosphere that prevents us from feeling anger at reproach should equally seoure us from feeling pleasure at praise; but I am a parcenu, and I own to being delighted with your approbation.

The Queen-It is sincere, I assure you .-Nay, I am selfish in being charmed with what you have done. For we are Allies, you know, and if the fleet of poor dear Isabella or one from Naples, or from China, should be too menacing, what a comfort to have such a place as this to run to, only seventy five miles from the Isle of Wright.

The Emperor-I could hardly quarrel with say cause that made your Majesty my guest. Another Louis of France has welcomed a Sovereign of England.

The Queen-Yee; but that was a Sovereign the English were only too happy to get rid of. I am told that they like me too well for that; and that they would try to shake every throug in Europe rather than that I should be humiliated. And what English folks in earnest try to do is generally done.

The Emperor-Your Majesty's remarks are unexceptionably just, however unable I may be to regard them as apropos of anything on which we are conversing.

The Queen-You do your wits injustice, your Majesty. The Emperor (carelessly)-So they say especially the wits of the press. May I have the honor of attending your Majesty to lunch? I am so enchanted that you like my. fortifications. The Queen-And I that you like wine.

The Emperor-Your Majesty? The Queen-Which have the additional advantage of being portable. There lie a few of them. [Points to ships.] And when your Uncle, there, talks about renewing the marvels of Epypt, remind him that it was with some portable fortifications like those, only not so strong, that one marvel of Egypt was worked.

The Emperor-I am devout-and yet my Scriptural knowledge fails me. Will your Majesty-

The Queen (laughing)-For shame! I said a marvel, not a plague. I meant the Battle of the Nile. The Prince-And, mein Gott, that cleared Egypt of the plague of Fregs, for one time! Ha, ha! Ho, he! [Keeps on laughing all the way to the pavilion, which is exceedingly rude in H. R. POTOMAC FISH FOR SALE.
